WESTWARD, THE COURSE OF

EMPIRE.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

THE DAY THAT OUR GOOD SHIP SAILED.
(BY OUR TRAVELLING REPRESENTATIVE.)

If it nothing to leave a land behind that has been kind to you? If it is, then there is not that in you that can be called "optimistic"—not at which may be called "lyrical." What though it is best for a few months: 'tis the great and wide-waving sea divides you, and its paths you know not; it has for you no token that you know: it changes at fits and starts—ever constant. When the ship you have chosen for your home moves out from the dock, and the line of division begins, the feeling of separation also begins and ever broadens and deepens until it is swallowed up in the immenseness of the ocean, where there is only sea and water and your transient dwelling-place. When you move from that quay where stood your friends waving good-byes, you left not those alone; you left the good old 'e' which was made for man. The 'e' was ever a faithful, unfeigned friend. It has always seemed to me most attempting to master it to him to his will. And in the course of his hard studies he did master it. Then the great green-backed animal is unshorn, he makes his rider uneasy. No, the 'e' was made for man, and the sea for fishes. Everything to its element. The albatross caught and brought aboard a vessel immediately gets, as man gets uneasy, when he attempts to win the sea to his needs. A certain bishop, when dying, seemed to regard his passage from this world as a thing to be lamented. His body-servant ventured to remind him that he was going to a land of happiness, but the good fitter in God said, "Ah, 'e', John, but England is a very good place." Let us admit all the pleasures of voyaging with its attendant array of odours, and all that—there still remains the fact that the dry land, with its odours more distributed and its surefootedness, is good enough for us.

IN MEMORIAM.

I have eaten my Christmas breakfast under many skies, and this one I ate on board the Carthage at Williamsons' point. "This fact in itself is nothing, but there comes to me with the thought the associations connected with that morning. To rise at 6 o'clock, that is a new experience. Getting my middle-sleep is generally connected with that hour. To see the harbour of Melbourne in the early morning, that is another experience. Slashed along the rail on the lower deck lay a score of Lascars fishing; dark-visaged, slow-thoughted men, who will sit there all day in the hope of fish that are slow to respond. Yet they will fish on, and show no disappointment. Others are eating their breakfasts, squatting round a large bowl of rice and curry. A dip with slow and leisurely fingers in the water, a long pull at the lipped pipe, a passionate embrace with each other, and so they spend this time on Christmas morning. Soon crowds of bathers throng about the ship, and out go lines without number in the still water. And now look beyond the Lascars and the sailors and the surrounding shipping; loo! far off. There rises the city of Melbourne. With a glass you can see all plainly, the heart of the metropolis, the range of buildings to the east, Government House, St. Kilda, and beyond, all in the mist of the morning.

What thoughts do all that bring up? The days half a century ago, when Balmoral and Flinders pastured their flocks on this then uninhabited coast, of the time when Colling-street was a stock-yard, or part of one; and when Imperial explorers declared the land good for nothing, an "impossible" land; of the time when with the master of the navy, the admiral of the fleet, a New South Wales Governor named the place Melbourne; of the days when other explorers like Sir Thomas Mitchell, whom the penguins taught the way, pierced the heart of what is now Victoria, and told of what might yet be achieved, of the period when Gippsland and the Murray River district were unknown lands, of those first ardent days in the early fifties, when contemporaneous with the getting of a separate Government and a Constitution, there came the getting of gold also—there fell the Great Rush of '53. Yes, of all this and much more would you think if you stood with me this Christmas morning on the deck of the Carthage. For here rises, in a mini 50 years ago; where rides the Earl of Hopetoun through high-crowned horses, the black fellow with his spear a generation ago; where sits the merchant prince at Teviot before his Chateau Leoville and olive, there sat a kangaroo; one man's life ago. None but the Anglo-Saxons could have done that. Where has any other race built up great nations outside of themselves? Look at the Dutch in Java, the French in India, Guiana, and Lower Canada, the Germans in Africa, the Portuguese alone succeeded in successful colonisation of all those nations that rivalled England, Holland, and Brazil: that is one record. But England, and the United States and Canada and Australia and India, there is another record, and of such a kind that we who consider it must stand in amazement. We have the "faculty" for colonisation, and it is a great faculty. Are we losing it? It is a point to prove, but we have lost it, even if we were losing the great family we might well be satisfied, for all the fields for colonisation have been entered upon. The desert itself and the Dark Continent have been told off to the spoiler and the pioneer. In the natural course of things, there will be no need for new fields for English colonisation for a long period of time. We have only taken up the fringe of the continents that are ours, the broad champaign is yet to be touched. There is Victoria, the most fully populated of the colonies according to its size; yet Victoria is but begun. It had 1,086,119 of population; it could support seven times that. And we shall be able to put five Victorias in the sprawling colony of Queensland; that land of the golden promise. Yet there will never be a Melbourne in Queensland; there can be but one Melbourne, to be built in Australia, in Australia. The days of centralisation are gone, the days of decentralisation have begun; there will be more Ballarat's and Newcastle's and Townsville's, and fewer Sydney's and Melbourne's.

But that is neither here nor there, for prophecy is cheap: "talks" is cheap, I say, "as is true now as it was in the days of the Hodder Schoolmaster. And even Christmas musing and moralising must have an end, and breakfast and lunch and dinner must be eaten, and we must "move on." Yet I would like to have had more of my brother landmen on board the Carthage on that Christmas Day, to show them with what admirable taste these sailors decorated the saloon, and what a wonderful six-story cake we had on exhibition. All day long visitors from Williamson and from the city came down, and all day courteous officers gave up their pleasure to give pleasure to others. It was a fine day when one could wish to remember, a day of good cheer, sweet—sweeter. Once while would say, "precious." But let us pause at this, for the next day was one to be remembered hereafter, even when inhabiting the hottest of all places of which literature speaks. It was a sunburning, depleting, brain-dyspepsia, mordant-debasing kind of day. No man could say that he was a thrice-visitor in that city, the Litany would be his only refuge. Melbourne people boast of their climate, but it is a thing to be taken at once, and not by specimen days. All day through that terrible heat I visited artists and artistes studios, and the Art Gallery and the public buildings, and I thought what it was all over that I had done as much penance as would wipe off last year's sins. But we left Melbourne behind at last, and came next, with its modest architecture and mountain-backed beauty. Early in the morning we got there. Mount Lofty, 3000ft up, cooled its head in the white clouds, and beneath the city put on its holiday attire. Not Independence Day, but Anniversary Day, I think they called it. And already, when we landed, the people were gathering at Large

Bay for their eating on the staring sands. What a contrast are Melbourne and Adelaide to Sydney in this respect! Sydney had within 15 minutes of its own a score of wooden boats, where sea and sun are too. What are St. Kilda and Large Bay to Middle Harbour and Bondi? Let us not think on. But instead, in the scorching afternoon, those crowds of people at Large Bay sitting in the shade of the pines, having found the sands too much for them.

Slow, steady South Australia, one of the first yet to be one of the last! Before Queensland, before Victoria, yet following them now! And why? Because she had no mining settlement. It is a thing to be noted that in Australia settlement has followed mining. Victoria, New South Wales, and Queensland received their first impetus from mining, an impetus which they have never lost. South Australia has just gone ahead on the basis of her agricultural and pastoral development, and now she ranks fourth in the list in population and revenue. Queensland has over a million pounds more revenue than she has and her population is fifty thousand more. Yet South Australia has a day before her, when it comes to that, though it comes but falteringly. Her courage has been great, her endurance is also great. If the cost averages 11/- per ton of wheat to the sea, that is after all better in the long run, if it be constant, than gold mining or silver mining; for the soil lasts, and the labour put into it goes on reproducing. To mining there is an end sometime, and then the tale is told. All agricultural countries have developed slowly, as witness the eastern States of the United States and the provinces of Canada. Fortunes are not made quickly in cultivating wheat, barley, oats, potatoes, hay, and vines, but there is built up a good colony.

The great green-backed animal is unshorn, he makes his rider uneasy. No, the 'e' was made for man, and the sea for fishes. Everything to its element. The albatross caught and brought aboard a vessel immediately gets, as man gets uneasy, when he attempts to win the sea to his needs. A certain bishop, when dying, seemed to regard his passage from this world as a thing to be lamented. His body-servant ventured to remind him that he was going to a land of happiness, but the good fitter in God said, "Ah, 'e', John, but England is a very good place." The rain continues generally throughout the colony, being especially heavy in the inland districts. Blackall reports the river in high flood, and at Chartersville the Warrego river is nearly 60ft. above summer level, and about a mile wide at that town. All parts are flooded. All the railway lines are more or less affected by the floods, but especially the central line, which is flooded in a number of places, and traffic is partially blocked. The oysters beds at Moreton Bay and the vicinity have suffered severely from the late rains and floods, and tides will be enormous.

Thomas McRae, assistant lighthouse keeper at Point Lonsdale, stated that the course of the vessel was not an unusual one, and the accident was due to the strong tide forcing her on shore as she was in a bay about to go on a fresh tack. The evidence against the captain of caravels navigation was concluded, and that against the mate was commenced.
